THE considerations, which have induced the author of this discourse to forward a second impression, are the following, viz. The frequent enquiry which has been made for it,—there being none of the former impression to be obtained—the solicitation of a number of gentlemen, whose opinions he esteems, together with a desire, that it may be generally useful.

— In this edition, the style is in many instances corrected, and some new thoughts added. Considering the more refined taste of the present day, it may be thought, that further corrections were necessary. The author is sensible, that there is sufficient room for corrections; but as he thinks his meaning is sufficiently clear, as it now is, he submits it to a candid perusal.

A DISCOURSE, &c.

A C T S ii. 42.

And they continued, stedfastly, in the Apostles doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers.

IN the preceding part of this chapter, we have an account of the most extraordinary and remarkable out-pouring of the spirit of God, and such an instance of divine power attending the dispensation of truth, as, perhaps, was never known from the apostles days down to the present period of time. There was a great multitude collected around the Apostles, from different quarters, and, doubtless, for very different purposes : some, probably, out of mere curiosity, to hear what those “ babblers ” would say : others to mock and ridicule them ; for we are informed that some said “ these men are full of new wine : ” And it is not unreasonable to suppose that some might come to be instructed into that system of truths, which occasioned so much noise and tumult at that time. However, notwithstanding their views and designs were so various, we find that divine truth was attended with such power, that a great part of them “ were pricked to the heart, and said unto Peter and the rest of the Apostles, men and brethren, what shall we do ? ” Peter immediately replied, “ repent and be baptised in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins. ” Divine power still attended the preaching of Peter ; for we find, that many received his words gladly, and were baptised ; and the number was no less than about three thousand. “ And the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls.”

We have a further account of those converts in our text, and the words following. And by the account the sacred historian gives us, it is evident they were touched to some purpose ; their profession was not merely nominal, or the effect of a lifeless flame which the apostle had blown up in their minds ; for we are assured, that they continued to feel the force of divine truth, and to act up to the character of real christians. They continued, as the apostle informs us in our text, stedfastly in the apostles doctrine and fellowship ; that is, they believed the same things with the apostles, and so had fellowship with them, in all the sacred doctrines of Christianity. And those converts who were baptised, not only believed the same things, but they also lived in the practice of the same duties which the apostles observed ; for it is said, that they continued with them stedfastly, in breaking of bread and in prayers, as well as in doctrine. By breaking of bread with the apostles, we are undoubtedly to understand, that they continued to celebrate with them the memorial of Christ's death ; that they lived in the observation of that ordinance and institution. Expositors thus understand it. It cannot be understood to mean, that they held up civil communion with the apostles, that is, jointly partook of each other's temporal substance ; for the apostle mentions this afterwards : and besides, the apostle considers this as a religious rite ; placing it among their religious exercises, such as having fellowship with them in doctrine, and continuing with them in prayers. And the celebration of the Lord's Supper is elsewhere signified, by breaking of bread ; as in Acts xx. 7. The breaking of bread, therefore, must have an immediate reference to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. And it is worthy of our particular observation, that the apostle mentions the breaking of bread, or attending upon the memorial of Christ's death, as what those who were baptised united in; not as what some did, but as a thing that was common to them all. It at least includes all the adults. There is nothing said which gives us the least reason to conclude, that there was any distinction respecting the institution of the Lord's Supper, more than respecting doctrine and prayers.

The words, therefore, may lead us to make the following observation, viz. That those adults whom the apostles baptised, were considered as communicants, and as being holden to an attendance upon all gospel institutions, the Lord's Supper not excepted.

If the three thousand, who were baptised on the day of pentecost, or the adults included in that number, were considered and viewed as communicants at Christ's table, we have presumptive evidence, at least, that it was their common practice, when they administered baptism to adults, to receive and consider them as communicants at the table of the Lord.

But this may further appear, in the course of the ensuing enquiries. What is proposed in further discoursing from these words, is,

FIRST, To show, that those adults who had the privilege of baptism for themselves or their seed, in the days of the apostles, were considered as communicants, and as being equally holden to an attendance upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as upon any other divine institution.

SECONDLY, More particularly to enquire, whether the practice of OWNING THE COVENANT, as it is called, which admits persons to the privilege of baptism, who professedly and practically withhold their attendance on the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, be scriptural and so to be indulged.

Under this particular it is proposed to consider every thing which is offered in favor of the practice of owning the covenant, and to suggest reasons for its exclusion.

In discoursing upon the points now proposed, I shall treat the practice of owning the covenant with freedom and plainness, yet nothing personal is intended, respecting those who are friendly to it.

I hope there are none so set in any particular scheme, as to be unwilling it should come under a serious examination; or, to give it up, if it be not founded on the sacred oracles of the living God. I would request, that every one would divest his mind of all prejudice, and be disposed to receive light, whether it may be in favor of, or in opposition to former sentiments. Casting away all wrath and strife, and laying aside all superfluity of naughtiness, be disposed to receive with meekness the ingrafted word, which is able to make you wise unto salvation. I will now proceed,

FIRST, To attempt to show, that those adults who had the privilege of baptism for themselves or their seed, in the days of the apostles, were considered as communicants, and as being equally holden to an attendance upon the Lord's Supper, as upon any other divine institution.

I do not suppose, neither would I be understood to say, that an attendance upon the institution of the Lord's Supper, or any other particular instituted duty, is the term or qualification for baptism; but an observation of and an attendance upon all public instituted duties is the term. What is meant is, that the apostles viewed and considered those adults whom they baptised, equally holden to observe all the duties and institutions of the Christian religion. One duty or institution was not dispensed with rather than another. And I can see no room to doubt of this, from any thing said in the writings of the apostles. The sacred scriptures, give no intimation of a different practice, in the days of the apostles; but afford much positive evidence, that they did consider those whom they baptised, as being equally holden to walk together in an attendance upon all instituted duties. This not only appears clear to me, but some, who have been zealous advocates for a contrary practice, have declared, that it is so evident to them as not to admit of a doubt. One in particular, when writing in vindication of that practice which tolerates persons in the omission of the Lord's Supper, says, concerning that ordinance and institution, "This was an ordinance appointed for the whole body of Christ's visible church, who professed the christian faith: and accordingly, they thus practised in the apostles days; as all the disciples attended upon this memorial."* This concession, in one who is an advocate for a contrary practice, is somewhat remarkable; and is not unfavorable, to what is now supposed, viz. That the apostles were strangers to the practice of administering baptism; to such as live in the neglect of plain gospel institutions:

But we will proceed to a more particular consideration of the practice of the apostles, to see whether it be not evident, that they considered all the adults whom they baptised, as holden to an attendance upon all instituted duties of the covenant, the Lord's Supper not excepted.† And the following things afford satisfying evidence, that the apostles administered baptism to no adults personally, or their seed, excepting such as they considered as communicants, or holden to an attendance upon all institutions, without excepting the Lord's Supper.

* Ely's Serm, on Gal. iii. 27. p. 34.

† It is taken for granted here, and through this discourse, that the same qualifications are requisite in an adult, for the dedication of his seed in baptism, as for the dedication of himself. If it were necessary in the apostles days, for an adult to engage to attend upon all instituted duties in order to his own baptism, it must have been necessary to the dedication of his seed. This, it is supposed, no one will dispute.

I. The nature and import of the commission, which our Lord gave his apostles, leads us to conclude, that they considered all adults whom they baptised, as holden to the practice of all Christian duties.

We have the highest reason to suppose, the apostles acted up to the spirit and meaning of their commission. And the commission which Christ gave them, made it incumbent on them to insist upon it, that all whom they should baptise, should attend upon all instituted duties. The commission which Christ gave his apostles, is expressed in these words; “Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;—teaching them to observe ALL THINGS whatsoever I have commanded you.”^{*} This commission made it incumbent on the apostles, first to teach, and then to baptise: But this is not all; for, in it they were strictly charged to insist upon it, that all those whom they should thus teach and baptise, should observe all things, that is, all the duties which Christ had commanded them.—And, was not the Lord’s Supper one duty which Christ had just instituted and made incumbent on his disciples? Was not this commanded duty, therefore, one thing that they were to insist upon should be observed, by those whom they should baptise? This commission will no more admit of tolerating persons in a professed and practical omission of the institution of the Lord’s Supper, than in the neglect of any other institution.—It is as inconsistent with the plain meaning and import of the commission, to tolerate those, who have the privilege of baptism, in a neglect of the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper, as in an omission of any other duty. And, as we have reason to believe the apostles acted up to the spirit of their commission, so we must conclude, that those adults, who had the privilege of baptism granted them by the apostles, were viewed and considered as equally holden to an attendance upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as upon any other instituted duty. If we are to make up a judgment concerning the practice of the apostles by the commission they received from Christ, we must conclude, that their disciples or baptised adults were holden and bound to attend upon all instituted duties, without excepting the instituted memorial of Christ's death.

Again,

II. The account given us of the transactions of the apostles, affords another reason for concluding, that they considered the adults to whom they administered baptism, as bound to attend upon all instituted duties; without excepting the instituted memorial of Christ's death.

We have no reason to think, from any thing the apostles said or transacted, that some adults who enjoyed the privilege of baptism, were considered as communicants and others were not; or, that some did attend upon the instituted memorial of Christ's death, and others were tolerated in a neglect or omission of that institution. We may as soon find sufficient evidence to conclude, that some did not continue stedfast in the apostles doctrine, and in prayers, and were tolerated in such a neglect or omission, as that they were tolerated and indulged in a neglect of the institution of the Lord's Supper. It is very possible, that some might but seldom have an opportunity of attending upon that memorial, as well as upon other instituted duties; yet, as often as they had opportunity to do it, they were equally under obligations to attend upon it as upon other duties of the covenant; at least there is no reason for any other conclusion, either from what the apostles said, or the account we have of their transactions. But, we have much positive evidence, that all baptised adults, were bound to attend upon the memorial of Christ's death, as well as all other covenant duties. The apostles, in all their letters and transactions, treated all their disciples as being in one standing, and as united in one body;—having one faith, one Lord, and one baptism. There is not the least intimation of any distinction among them; especially, it is no where intimated, that some were communicants at the Lord's table and others were not.—And does it, my hearers, look probable, that there was this distinction since there is no mention made of it? Why should we think there was this difference or distinction, when there is no intimation of it? It is a conclusive argument that there was no such distinction known to the apostles, since it is no where intimated in any of their writings or transactions. I am sensible, that as to some, such as the Eunuch, Cornelius, and others, it is not said, explicitly, that they were bound to attend upon the Lord's Supper; but can we from thence conclude, that they were not holden to an attendance upon it, whenever they should have opportunity? If we may, we may also conclude, that they were not holden to an attendance upon one duty of the covenant; for no one duty is particularized. There is as much mention made of the institution of the Lord's Supper as of any other institution; as of doctrine or prayers. If it be a sufficient reason to conclude, that the Eunuch, Cornelius, or others, were not considered as holden to the observation of the institution of the Lord's Supper, as often as they should have opportunity, because it is not particularly mentioned, we must for the same reason conclude they were not holden to practise any Christian duty, because no one is mentioned. The account is left in such a manner as leads us to conclude, that there was no distinction thought of among Christian duties; either those persons must be considered as holden to all, or to the observation of no instituted duty of the covenant.

Furthermore, the positive evidence that there was no distinction among christian duties, made or allowed of by the apostles will be increased, if it be considered, that the celebration of the Lord's Supper is mentioned as what was common to the disciples, in the apostles days. When that memorial was attended upon, it is mentioned as what was common to the disciples in that day: Thus it is said, Acts xx. 7. "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, &c. &c. It is not said when some of the disciples came together to break bread, but when the disciples," &c. The apostle speaks of it as what the disciples did in common; not as what some did and others neglected.

Again; it is expressly said, that they who were admitted to baptism, on the day of Pentecost, did continue, stedfastly, with the apostles, in breaking of bread, as well as in doctrine and prayers.

On the whole, therefore, have we not the most abundant reason to conclude, both from the nature of the commission which Christ gave his apostles, and also from the account given us of their transactions, that they considered such adults as they received to baptism, as holden to observe and attend upon all instituted duties, without excepting the institution of the Lord's Supper? What reason have we to think that the apostles tolerated their disciples in a neglect of the institution of the Lord's Supper, rather than any other instituted duty? I think no one, who impartially considers the case, can find the least evidence, that the apostles ever thought of any distinction among covenant duties; their commission made none, and there is no appearance of any distinction being allowed or made in their practice.

Let us now proceed,

upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, be scriptural and to be indulged.

The practice of owning the covenant, admits adults to the privilege of baptism, for themselves and their seed, who neither view themselves under any covenant obligations to live in the observation of a plain gospel institution, nor do the church consider them as being bound by their covenant to attend upon it; and therefore not disciplineable or censurable for a neglect and omission of it.* This indeed, is not the only distinction which is made betwixt those who own the covenant and those who are in full communion, that the former are not considered as being under covenant vows to celebrate the instituted memorial of Christ's death, and the latter are; but those, who own the covenant, are not considered as having a right to a voice in the church, when transacting the affairs of Christ's kingdom.† They do not consider themselves as being under the same obligation to watch over and deal with one another, that such are under who are in full communion: And many do not consider themselves as under such obligations to a holy and religious life, as such are under who are communicants at Christ's table; but this I consider as an abuse of the original practice. The practice, therefore, will not be considered in this gross sense of it. We will only enquire, whether the practice of administering baptism to such adult persons, or to the seed of such as professedly and practically withhold an attendance upon the institution of the Lord's Supper, be scriptural?

If the practice of owning the covenant, as described

* I am not insensible, that some call the covenant which such make a full and complete covenant; but I am unable to see the propriety of its being so called, since the covenant person does not mean to engage, nor the church understand him as engaging an attendance upon a plain covenant duty and express command of Jesus Christ.

† The Synod, held at Cambridge, Anno 1662, which began the practice of owning the covenant, did not consider persons, in that particular standing, as having any right to vote in the church, or with those who were in full communion.

in this enquiry, be not scriptural, it is not to be indulged ; for the scripture must be our only rule. If we have not scripture precept or example for the practice, it has no foundation. As to positive institutions, we are bound by the express will of God. We may, indeed, argue relatively to them as Naaman the leper did, about the rivers of Jordan and Pharpar ; we may say that we do not see, why such and such methods may not do, as well as those which we find expressly instituted by God ; but we have no more right to pursue such reasonings in practice, than Naaman had to pursue his ; neither can we expect better success. We must abide by what is revealed, and be determined by the institution itself. Such as are unwilling to be determined by the Bible, must answer it to Christ, who hath said, that heaven and earth shall pass away before one jot or tittle shall fail of all that he hath said. A church ought be very cautious, how they adopt rules and practices which are of mere human invention ; for in adopting such rules, they reject the authority of Christ, and so pollute all their offerings. In vain, says Christ, ye do worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men.* It is, therefore, of very great importance, that a church grounds its practice upon the laws and institutions of its king and head. With these things in view, let us examine the practice of owning the covenant. And it is hoped every mind will be attentive, and so far divested of all prejudice, as to be willing to know and receive the truth, wherever it may appear.

In prosecuting this enquiry, I shall,

I. Consider those things which are urged in favor of the practice.

II. A variety of things will be exhibited, to show the unscriptural nature of the practice of owning the covenant ; and why it ought to be abolished.

* Mat. xv. 9.

I. We are to consider those things which are urged in favour of the practice of owning the covenant, or of admitting such adults to the privilege of baptism, for themselves or seed, who professedly and practically withhold their attendance upon the institution of the Lord's Supper.

It is my design, to take notice of the various things which I can recollect to have seen or heard urged, in favor of the practice, however trivial ; and to detect their fallacy. And,

1st. In vindication of the practice, it hath been said, that many very great and good men have been and still are in it ; and that it has been of long continuance.

REPLY. As to the time this practice has been in being, I think we may safely affirm, it cannot be traced back to the days of the apostles.—And it is certain it was never known among the churches in this land, till near half a century after the first settlement of it. But, if it should be granted to have been of long continuance, yet in as much as the apostles were strangers to it ; this ought to have no weight in our minds.—And, as to such great and good men as have been in the practice, I believe, such as urge their example as an argument for it, wholly mistake the views they have always entertained of it. I trust, I may venture to say, that not one out of ten of those who have been in the practice, have been for it. Those who have written upon the subject, and have been on the side of the practice, have in general acknowledged, that although they were in it they were not for it.* So that notwithstanding many great and good men have been in the practice, yet, in as much as they, in general, have not been for it, it ought to be considered as an evidence and testimony against the practice, rather than an argument in its favor. Besides, it ought to be considered and remembered, that many great and good men have not only been in but for a contrary practice, and could never be reconciled to the practice of owning the covenant. Many have been zealously against the practice of owning the covenant, while very few have been really for it. But if this should not satisfy all, we have other examples to oppose to the practice of those, who have been in it, which ought to give full satisfaction; I mean the example of the apostles. They were as great and as good men, as can be supposed ever to have been in the practice, with this very weighty circumstance in their favor, that they were under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost; and there is not the least evidence, that they were ever in or for the practice under consideration; but the practice is against the spirit of their commission, and the whole of their transactions. So that what is now urged in favor of the practice, from the example of great and good men, who have been barely in it, cannot be considered as having any weight, since not only other great and good men, but the apostles, who were under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, have been not only not in the practice, but against it.

* But, why is it that one says, I am in it, but not for it ;—another, that scarcely one minister in this nation is pleased with it, if it be a practice which is of divine institution ? If God hath instituted the practice, or if it be agreeable to divine institution, why are they not for it ? Why are they not pleased with it ? Are not God's institutions wise and well calculated to answer his own purposes ? But if the practice be not agreeable to divine institution, why are they in it ?

But,

2dly. It has been further urged, in favour of the practice now under consideration, that under the former dispensation, the Jews who did not keep the passover, had the privilege of circumcision for their seed; from whence it is inferred, that it is the will of God that the seal of the covenant should be administered, to some at least, who do not attend upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. It is said, that the Jew under ceremonial defilement, who might not keep the pasfover, might, nevertheless, have the privilege of circumcision.*

REPLY. Whoever carefully attends to the case, must see, that there is nothing in what is now urged, which makes any thing for the practice of owning the covenant, or of administering baptism to such as live in the professed and continued omission of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The Jew, in case of legal defilement, was forbidden to eat of the passover; in omitting it, under ~~these~~^{those} circumstances, he did it in obedience to the command of God; but he who owns his covenant withholds his attendance upon the Lord's Supper in opposition to a plain and express command.

Furthermore, The cases of the defiled Jew, and of those who own the covenant, are totally dissimilar in another respect. The Jew, who was defiled, was only an occasional omitter of the passover; he was not suffered to omit it time after time, and year after year; he might not omit the passover so much as one time, on the whole; on account of legal defilement: This will appear, if we attend to the case as stated Numb. ix. 1—13. It appears from the account therein given us, that God had directed the people to keep the passover, on the 14th day of the first month, according to the original institution. It happened that some were defiled with the touch of a dead body. They went to Moses with their case, as they were at a loss about keeping the passover with the people. Moses asks direction of God. God answers Moses as in the 9th and 10th verses, in these words. "Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, if any man of you, or of your posterity be unclean by reason of a dead body, or bein a journey afar off yet he shall keep the passover unto the Lord. The fourteenth day of the second month they shall keep it." It appears from these words, that the person who was unclean on the 14th day of the first month, when the body of the Jews kept the passover, might not live in the neglect of it till the next annual return of the passover, he must keep it the very next month; he might not omit it, on the whole, for one time. So that, on the whole there was no toleration of an omission for any length of time, on account of ceremonial defilement. At most, no more can be pretended, than a toleration of an occasional omission, during the short term of ceremonial defilement, or for one month only; he must keep the passover as often as the rest of the people.*

Now, how does this at all justify, or even countenance the practice of admitting such to the privilege of baptism, who omit the Lord's Supper, not merely on some occasions, but on all occasions, and that year after year, and if they please forever? If it were true, that a Jew might have circumcision, although he should neglect to keep the passover occasionally, could we from thence infer, that it is the will of God, that a person, under the gospel dispensation, should have the privilege of baptism, although he should live in a continued omission of the Lord's Supper, year after year, and if he should please forever? I am sure it cannot be pretended. There is nothing in the case of the defiled Jew, that so much as countenances the practice of owning the covenant. We are rather taught by it, that it is the will of God that no public institution should be neglected or omitted; for, rather than the Jew should, on the whole, live in one omission of the passover, God makes special provision and a new institution for him, who was under such circumstances,

† Some have said, that ceremonial cleanness was typical of moral purity; and as a Jew, who doubted of his ceremonial cleanness was tolerated in an omission of the passover, so may a Christian be tolerated in omitting the Lord's Supper, when he doubts of his moral purity.

Answer. The Jew was not tolerated in one omission. He might not delay more than one month on account of his doubts, or in case of real defilement. So that if there were any thing typical in the case, it would not prove any thing in favour of a professed and continued omission of any ordinance; for, on the whole there was no omission tolerated or allowed; And but one month was allowed for the removal of real defilement.

as prohibited his keeping it with the body of the people. Again, 3dly. God's dealings with the Jews in Josiah's time, have been mentioned in justification of the practice of owning the covenant. It has been said, that the Jews, who from the time of the Judges to Josiah's time, had not regularly attended upon the passover, enjoyed circumcision and were not rejected and cast off by God ;—from hence it is inferred, that persons may be so far in good standing in the covenant, as to be qualified for baptism, although they live in a continual omission of the Lord's Supper.*

REPLY. Is it not as true that the Jews, as a body, were in gross idolatry when Josiah came to the throne, as that they had omitted, for a long time, regularly to keep the passover? Certainly it is.† May we not then, with as much reason, infer that baptism may be administered to gross idolators, as to those who neglect a plain institution? If we may infer that persons may be qualified for the seal of the covenant, when they live in the continued omission of plain institutions, from God's not casting off the Jews when they neglected regularly to attend upon the passover, we may infer, that persons in gross idolatry are qualified for the seal of the covenant; because it is just as true that the Jews were not cast off when in gross idolatry, as that they were not when they neglected the passover; for they were in open idolatry at the same time.

What is here urged, therefore, is as much in favor of admitting gross idolators to baptism, and of their being qualified subjects for it, as of the practice of owning the covenant.

The truth of the case is this; the Jews in the beginning of Josiah's reign, were utterly unqualified for one church privilege.—Had an individual been in the state the Jews were, in the beginning of Josiah's reign, the church must have excommunicated him, if they had proceeded according to the rules which God had given them : And God, in not casting them off, acted above the laws which he had given his church as a rule of their conduct. God had a right so to do, but his church must abide by the laws and rules which God gives them.

* Ely's Sermon, p. 31.

† See 2. Kings, chap. xxii. and xxiii.

4thly. It has been further said, in favor of owning the covenant, that such as were baptised in infancy, have a right, merely on that account, to the seal of baptism for their seed ; therefore, nothing further is requisite than to own the covenant.

REPLY. Do such as urge this mean, that children have a right to baptism, merely on account of the baptism of the parent ? If this be their meaning, it is nothing in favor of the practice of owning the covenant ; for it makes owning the covenant wholly unnecessary. If the baptism of parents be, in itself a qualification for the baptism of their seed, then owning the covenant is wholly unnecessary : And so what is now urged can be nothing in favor of owning the covenant, nor any other personal transaction, in adult years.

But, the supposition that the baptism of a parent is, in itself, a qualification for the baptism of his seed, is altogether groundless and unscriptural. The baptism of a parent is nothing, unless he continues in good standing in the covenant, or lives in the practice of all covenant duties. Hence says the apostle, "Circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law, but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision."§ It appears from this passage, that the baptism of a parent is nothing, unless he keep the law, or lives in the practice of covenant duties. If we should suppose that parents were baptised in infancy or riper years, yet should not live in the practice of covenant duties, they would be no better than heathens or publicans,—their circumcision would be uncircumcision. In order to a person's having any standing in the covenant, it is absolutely necessary, that he be neither a heretic nor immoral person ; persons of either of those characters may have no standing in the church of Christ. It is as necessary that a person who was baptised in infancy, should be found in the faith, and live in the practice of the duties of religion, in order to his having a standing in the church in adult years, or enjoying church privileges, as it is for any other person, whatever. Heresy or immorality disqualifies a person for church privileges; his circumcision becomes uncircumcision. † This leads us to see, that the baptism of a parent is not of itself a qualification for church privileges; he must be found in the faith, and live in the practice of the duties of religion; otherwise his circumcision becomes uncircumcision. These observations, also lead us to see, that it is as necessary, that a person who was baptised in infancy, should make a confession of his faith, and declare his compliance with the covenant of grace, in order to his enjoying privileges in adult years, as it is for any other person; for unless he be found in the faith, and do comply with the covenant, he is no better than the unbaptised,—his circumcision is become uncircumcision; and we must judge that he is found in the faith and does comply with the covenant, by the same rule by which we judge of others. So that what is now urged, respecting the baptism of parents, is nothing to the purpose; for if it be meant that the baptism of parents, in itself, qualifies their seed for baptism, then owning the covenant is perfectly unnecessary: But if it be meant that they must in addition to it, be in good covenant standing, that is, found in the faith and in the practice of covenant duties, this is utterly inconsistent with the practice of owning the covenant; for then it will be necessary that they live in the observation of the institution of the Lord's Supper, which is a covenant duty: So that what is now urged cannot be viewed as any support or justification of the practice of owning the covenant.

† Tit. iii. 10. 11. 2. Theff. iii. 11. 12, 13.

Again,

5thly. It has been said, in justification of the practice of owning the covenant, that an omission of the Lord's Supper is too small a failure, on account of which, to cut a person off from the privilege of baptism.

REPLY. 1st. A neglect to keep the passover, was not too small a failure in the view of God, to merit excommunication.

The Jew who did not keep the passover was to have no standing among God's people. It is said, "the man that is clean and not on a journey, that forbear-eth to keep the passover, even the same soul shall be cut off from his people."† Ceremonial defilement, or being on a distant journey apologized for an occasional omission of the passover, but not for a continued neglect. There was no sufficient apology or excuse could be given for a continued omission of the passover. It becomes us then to be very cautious, how we urge it as too small a failure, on account of which to cut persons off from church privileges, merely because they neglect the institution of the Lord's Supper; for that is as reasonable and important an institution as the passover; and yet we find that God viewed an omission of the latter a sufficient reason for excommunicating the delinquent.

2dly. I would enquire how it comes about, that it is viewed as so small and inconsiderable a failure, in a person to neglect the institution of the Lord's Supper?

Is not the institution of the Lord's Supper a duty of the covenant? Is it not as reasonable an institution as any one in the New Testament? Is not Christ infinitely worthy of a memorial? Has he not done enough to render a memorial of him both reasonable and delightful? How comes it about, then, that it is viewed as so very small and inconsiderable a failure, to neglect so plain and reasonable an institution? If living in the neglect of plain covenant duties does not disqualify for covenant privileges, it is difficult to say what does. If it be scandalous to live in the omission of plain, reasonable and important covenant duties, it is so to neglect the institution of the Lord's Supper; for that is a plain, a reasonable and important covenant duty: And it is difficult to account for it, that it should be viewed as so innocent and harmless an omission to withhold an attendance upon it. Whoever considers how plain and reasonable a duty it is, cannot urge the omission of it, as too small a failure to disqualify for covenant privileges; for if neglecting plain covenant duties does not disqualify persons for privileges, nothing can do it. And whoever considers how necessary an attendance upon the passover was in the view of God, in order to a standing in the church of old, will be very cautious how he urges a neglect of so important and reasonable an institution as that of the Lord's Supper, as being too small a failure on account of which to withhold covenant privileges. Again, 6thly. It has been said by some, in vindication of the practice of owning the covenant, that it is nowhere expressly forbidden.

REPLY. There are a thousand other possible practices which mankind may adopt, that are not expressly prohibited. The question is, is the practice agreeable to the institution? The want of institution is a sufficient prohibition. We have no right or warrant to take one step beyond the institution. If God has given us liberty to act, we have a warrant for acting; but a want of licence is a full prohibition. It is not expressly said, that you may not baptise your own children; but you do not venture upon the practice, because you do not find a warrant for it; so a want of licence in the present case, is a sufficient objection against the practice now under consideration, although it be not, by name, expressly prohibited. Furthermore, 7thly. It has been urged in favor of the practice of owning the covenant, that persons may be qualified for baptism, and not for the Lord's Supper; and therefore the practice of owning the covenant must be both lawful and necessary.

REPLY: I do not recollect ever to have seen a diversity of qualifications for the two ordinances, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, urged as a reason for the practice of owning the covenant, by any author who has written upon the subject; however, as I am persuaded that it has weight and influence in the view of some, in this place, I shall briefly consider its weight and merit. And here I would observe;

1st. It does not appear that God hath ever made any distinction betwixt the two ordinances, baptism and the Lord's Supper, in point of qualification; if it be so, we have no right to make any.

There is not the least evidence, from any thing written in our Bibles, that the apostles made any distinction, in point of qualification for the two ordinances, in their practice. The commission they received from Christ, and their practice agree in this, that one and the same subject is qualified for both ordinances; for those whom they baptised, continued with them in "breaking of bread," as well as in doctrine and prayers.

2dly. What is now urged, respecting a diversity of qualifications for the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, is contrary to the plain import of the practice you have always been used to, in this place.

You have ever had but one covenant; and a compliance with that has always been made necessary, both for the privilege of baptism and the Lord's Supper. You have always required persons to engage the same things in order to their enjoying either ordinance; excepting the one must engage an attendance upon the institution of the Lord's Supper and the other not. This makes it evident, that it was always supposed, by the church and people in this place, that the qualifications, I mean the essential qualifications for the two ordinances, were the same; otherwise they have always been wrong in insisting upon the same things as requisite for an attendance upon either.

3dly. What is now urged is contrary to the opinion of ministers in general, who have been in the practice of owning the covenant.

It is not on account of any real difference as to the qualifications for the two ordinances; that ministers practise baptising or giving the privilege of baptism to such adults as neglect the institution of the Lord's Supper; but in condescension to the groundless scruples and ignorance of the people. It is on this ground, and not on any real difference, as to the qualifications for the two ordinances, that the practice of owning the covenant rests, in the view of such ministers as practise upon it; so far as I am acquainted with their views of the practice.

4thly. Is it not demonstrably true, that there cannot be a diversity of qualifications for the two ordinances.

Our Saviour most certainly knew, what his will ever would be, respecting the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper: And he, very expressly, gave it in charge to his apostles, to insist upon it that the baptised should attend upon all instituted duties. "Go ye and teach all nations, baptising them in the name of, &c. teaching them to observe ALL things whatsoever I have commanded you." Now, had there been a diversity of qualifications for those two ordinances, we cannot suppose, that our Saviour would have charged his apostles to teach and insist upon it, that all those whom they should baptise, should do or observe all things whatsoever he had commanded.

Again. As a qualification for baptism, it is absolutely necessary that a person be in covenant with God; for baptism is a mark and token of the covenant; this mark and token cannot be fixed on any, excepting such as have a visible covenant relation to God:—

And, when a person takes upon him the covenant, he engages to do all the duties of the covenant ; this must be a necessary qualification for baptism. And can any pretend that it is a greater thing, or requires higher qualifications to do the duties of the covenant ; than to engage to do them ? And is not the Lord's Supper a covenant duty ? Does not the covenant comprehend all duties ? Most certainly it does. And does not God make over all the benefits, privileges, and blessings of the covenant to his covenant people ? There is nothing more manifest than that he does. If these things be so, how can there be higher qualifications requisite for the Lord's Supper than for baptism, since it is absolutely necessary that there be a covenant relation to God in order to baptism ? Since the covenant does extend to all Christian duties—and since God bequeaths all the blessings and privileges of the covenant to men, on the sole condition of their being in covenant with him, it is without the least shadow of reason that it is urged, that men may be qualified for baptism and not for the Lord's Supper ; for being in covenant with God is the condition of all covenant blessings ; is the alone qualification for baptism, for the Lord's Supper, and for all the blessings of Christ's kingdom. So that the practice of owning the covenant cannot be grounded on any real difference, in point of qualification for the two ordinances, baptism and the Lord's Supper.

But some may possibly say, that baptism is only an introduction into Christ's school, and so does not suppose that a person is fully instructed into the Christian religion, and prepared for all its ordinances.

Answer. That must be an egregious mistake ; for as baptism is a token of the covenant, and supposes that a person is in the covenant, so it always supposes that a person is instructed into the nature of it, and acquainted with the capital duties which are contained in it. And it is exceedingly evident, that our Saviour himself supposed, that such instruction was necessary to precede baptism, as qualified a person, an adult, to observe all the capital duties of the Christian religion. Hence, when he sent his apostles to baptise, he charged them in their commission, first to teach, then to baptise. Instruction was to precede baptism; and the instruction was, doubtless, to extend to all those duties which would be incumbent on them, in consequence of baptism: and those were all the duties of the Christian religion; for they were to teach them to observe all things whatsoever Christ had commanded them. This objection, therefore, proceeds from mistaken conceptions of the nature and design of baptism.

It may be further urged, that there must be greater qualifications requisite for the Lord's Supper than covenanting, because we find such special judgments threatned to, and actually indicted upon the profaners of the Lord's Supper, as cannot be found respecting the unworthy covenanter. It is said "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself." And the Corinthians who profaned the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, were visited with the judgment of pestilence, whereas there are no such warnings given against covenanting unworthily.

Answer. What the apostle means by damnation, in the passage just mentioned, is judgement; teaching us, that such as profane that ordinance do expose themselves to the awful judgments of heaven: And this was exemplified in the Corinthians, who suffered by the judgment of pestilence, as a punishment for their profaning that ordinance. But, has not God warned us in as solemn a manner against covenanting unworthily? Did not God threaten Israel with great and terrible judgments, for drawing near to him with their lips whilst their hearts were far from him? Turn your attention, also, to the case of Ananias and Sapphira. They had solemnly covenanted to dedicate themselves and their estate to the service of God; but they dealt deceitfully with him, and kept back part of the price for which they had sold their inheritance. And did God behold their conduct with greater indifferency, than the conduct of the Corinthians when they profaned the Lord's Supper? No; for he sent the most awful judgment upon them; they were struck dead in an instant!

Upon the whole, therefore, let us turn our attention which way we will, we have the utmost reason to conclude, that the qualifications for covenanting or baptism, are as great as those for the Lord's Supper; and so there cannot be any necessity of the practice of owning the covenant, on account of a diversity of qualifications, respecting the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. But,

8thly, It is urged, that notwithstanding the qualifications for baptism and the Lord's Supper are one and the same, yet, in as much as some may think themselves qualified for baptism, and at the same time scruple their qualifications for the Lord's Supper, kindness, tenderness and condescension, to the scrupulous, require that we admit them to the former in a neglect of the latter.—What is here urged, I take to be the great support of the practice, in the view of the most of those who are in it.

REPLY. I am an advocate for kindness and tenderness, and would act such a part as real kindness and tenderness require; but herein I must be directed by God, who best knows what is most for his glory and the good of men. We may not go to unjustifiable lengths, under the notion of kindness and tenderness. And, for my part, I am unable to find the least warrant in scripture, for setting aside, or dispensing with plain instituted duties, in condescension to the unjust scruples or prejudices of men. There are precepts and examples in abundance, for making indifferent things give way to the scruples and prejudices of mankind: But there is neither precept nor example for making divine ordinances and institutions give way to such scruples and prejudices. Indifferent things ought to be sacrificed to them; but divine institutions may not be dispensed with; they are more sacred than groundless prejudices*. We do well in giving up indifferent things for the sake of easing the consciences of the scrupulous, and in condescension to the prejudices of the weak, but the moment we set aside, or dispense with divine institutions for that purpose, we do that which is without any scripture precept or example. We have as good a right to give up every law and institution of Christ's kingdom, as one particular institution; for they are equally binding and clothed with the same authority.

What St. Paul says, respecting the condescension we ought to use towards "him that is weak in the faith," wholly respects indifferent things, such as particular days, meats and drinks; he does not give the least intimation, that we must give up or dispense with plain institutions for the sake of gratifying or giving ease to

* A scruple relative to an attendance upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, has been considered, as being very sacred indeed! But on what account or for what good reason, I am utterly unable to conceive. The institution of the Lord's Supper is a very plain one; and what can there be, which should render a scruple, as to attending upon it, so very virtuous, or even innocent? If a servant should scruple to comply with the will of his master, in a case where his will was obvious, and his demand reasonable, would such a scruple be thought an excuse! Scruples, as to doing what Christ most manifestly requires and demands, cannot, certainly, be the most innocent scruples. If it should be said, that the scrupulous person only scruples his qualifications to do as Christ directs, still it is difficult to conceive, how it can be considered as an excuse or apology; for a person not being prepared to do his Lord's will, when he knows what it is, was not considered by our Saviour himself, as affording the most acceptable apology. He says, "That servant should be beaten with many stripes."

A person being very serious in scrupling to do as Christ demands, or in scrupling his own qualifications to do it, does not, as I can conceive, afford the least apology or excuse. If a person should scruple to do that which is expressly forbidden, it would be a virtuous scruple: but when he scruples to do that which is expressly required, the scruple, instead of being virtuous, or even innocent, must become criminal. It is not to be wondered at, that men should sometimes scruple to do what other men require; but it is somewhat surprising, that they should scruple to do what JESUS CHRIST expressly demands, and consider it as virtuous and meritorious.

the weak and scrupulous†. And the instance of Paul's circumcising Timothy, in condescension to the prejudices of the Jews, is far from affording an example of such condescension as that which we have now under consideration. Paul, in circumcising Timothy, dispensed with no divine institution. It was a matter of perfect indifferency in itself, whether Timothy were circumcised or not, as circumcision was then abolished; but, in as much as his being circumcised would recommend him to the Jews, Paul consents to it; it was a matter of as much indifferency in the view of Paul, as whether Timothy should be cloathed in black or white. He sacrificed or dispensed with no institution, in condescension to the prejudices of the Jews; he only gave way so far to their prejudices, as to make use of that which was as indifferent, in its nature, as any thing that can be named. I trust, it must hence appear, that we have no right to make use of the condescension that is now plead for; we ought to be condescending in matters of indifferency, yet we have no right to dispense with divine institutions.

Although what has been said does sufficiently show, that we have no right to dispense with an attendance upon the institution of the Lord's Supper, as there is nothing in scripture that warrants it; and so that tenderness to the scrupulous does by no means require it; yet, I would suggest a few things further, which may tend to give further conviction. And,

1st. The state of such a person as scruples his qualifications for an attendance upon the Lord's Supper, while he thinks himself qualified to receive the seal of baptism, is such as requires a very different kind of treatment from indulging and condescending to gratify it.

The true state of the case is this, the person is in an error; for he is either qualified for both ordinances or for neither. What is wanting, in this case, is light and instruction. Our proper business is to teach and instruct him. To begin with him here would be aiming at the difficulty; it would be acting the part of skillful physicians, who aim at the disease, or like surgeons who make their applications directly to the wound. And I cannot think, that there would be any great difficulty in removing real and honest scruples, were we painful and laborious in our endeavors. But if we are superficial and easily glide over them, we shall rather confirm than remove them. This must be the only proper method of application. Since the person is really in an error, and wants light and instruction, it must be our proper business to communicate it to him in all possible ways; the nature of his case calls for it. Besides, 2dly. It is far from being an act of kindness and tenderness to indulge the scruples of such, who think themselves qualified for covenanting and baptism, and not for the Lord's Supper. It is not an act of kindness to the scrupulous.

Indulging such scruples, has a direct tendency to confirm them; for whatever we may say about their being groundless, we by indulging them so far as to admit such to privileges, do in fact allow them all the weight of well-grounded scruples: And it will be more difficult than ever to convince a person that his scruples are groundless, if a church act as if they were well founded. Besides, tolerating such scruples only makes persons easy under them. After their scruples are indulged and their children are baptised, they are less concerned than ever to remove them; and one special motive to be painful and laborious in making their way clear to the table of the Lord is removed, and will never have any more influence. Were we actuated, therefore from a true regard to the real interest of the scrupulous, we should never indulge such a scruple, but endeavor, in all possible ways, to remove it. Again, 3dly. Another thing which forbids indulgence, in the case under consideration, is the influence it would have on others.

Indulgence of the scruple under consideration is not only without a warrant from scripture, and injurious to the real interest of the scrupulous, but it hurts others; it begets just such scruples in the minds of others. When persons are trained up under a practice, which makes a distinction between the two ordinances, it naturally and almost unavoidably leads them to think, that there is a real distinction; and so multitudes grow up in the belief of it; thousands are taught it by the practice, who would never have thought of any distinction, had not the practice instilled it into them in the earliest part of life.

When persons, therefore, think themselves qualified for covenanting and the privilege of baptism, and yet doubt and scruple their qualifications for the Lord's Supper, instead of its being a duty and an act of kindness to grant the former in the neglect of the latter, there is every thing forbids it. It is contrary to the real interest of the scrupulous; it has a bad influence on others: And to dispense with institutions, in condescension to the erroneous scruples and prejudices of men, is without any warrant from scripture. The scripture recommends condescension to the weakness, ignorance and prejudices of men, so far as to make indifferent things give way, but no where does it teach us to sacrifice plain and express institutions to them.

9thly. Another thing which has been mentioned in favor of the practice of owning the covenant, is this; That if persons should come to the Lord's table and be unworthy communicants, their guilt would be greater than if they had only owned their covenant, and never attended upon the institution of the Lord's Supper.

REPLY. What is now urged is rather a reason, why persons would choose to have the privilege of baptism without attending upon the other institution, than an argument that it is the will of God they should. The case is the same as to all the privileges men enjoy ;— if they misimprove them, their guilt and condemnation will be enhanced : But can we from thence infer, that it is the will of God, that men should turn their backs on all the means of grace, and privileges of the gospel ? If persons should own the covenant in an unworthy manner, it would involve them in greater guilt than if they had never profaned the covenant : But, can we from thence infer, that it is the will of God they should receive baptism without so much as owning the covenant ? Certainly we cannot. But we might just as well conclude, that it is the will of God persons should have the privilege of baptism without owning the covenant, or even attending to one instituted mean of grace, as that it is God's will they should have such a privilege in a neglect of the Lord's Supper, on account of the superior guilt they would incur by an unworthy attendance upon that institution ; for it is as true, that a misimprovement of every gospel privilege, enhances the guilt of men, as that their guilt is increased by an unworthy attendance upon the Lord's Supper.

Besides, as the qualifications for covenanting and the Lord's Supper are one and the same, as the latter is only a branch or a duty of the covenant, so persons have no reason to fear attending upon the Lord's Supper, when they are well satisfied respecting their qualification for covenanting. There, is, therefore, no occasion for any abatement here, in as much as the qualifications are the same in both cases. If it should be granted, that a person would incur greater guilt by attending upon the Lord's Supper, in an unworthy manner, than if he should neglect to attend upon it, and that this were a sufficient reason for his enjoying baptism in a neglect of the Lord's Supper, we must, for the same reason, view it as a duty, to grant persons the privilege of baptism, without so much as owning the covenant, or even attending on one mean of grace; for in profaning the covenant or the means of grace, they would incur greater guilt than if they had never been guilty of such profanation. So that what is here urged in favor of owning the covenant cannot be viewed as any reason for it; for it equally excludes even the necessity of owning the covenant, and makes it as necessary to dispense with that, as with an attendance upon the Lord's Supper; for it is as true that he that covenants in an unworthy manner has greater guilt than if he had not pretended to covenant at all, as it is, that he that communes in an unworthy manner, incurs greater guilt than in neglecting to attend upon the Lord's Supper; and if it be a sufficient reason for excusing persons in the latter case, it must be in the former. Again, 10thly. Some, in justification of the practice of owning the covenant, have said, that John the Baptist administered baptism in his day; and those to whom he administered it, certainly did not attend upon the institution of the Lord's Supper.

REPLY. In the days of John the Baptist, the Lord's Supper was not instituted, and so it could not be viewed as a covenant duty, or a neglect of it a defect in a christian profession: But the case is very essentially different now, since the Lord's Supper is instituted and made an incumbent duty on all professors of christianity.

11thly. Another thing, which is of great weight with many, that has been urged in favor of owning the covenant is this, that if this practice be excluded, multitudes of children will be unbaptised, and in a state of heathenism.

REPLY. The best truths and the most reasonable institutions may be abused; it is possible this may;

but if the practice of owning the covenant be HOLD WITHIN in the limits of divine institution, we are not at liberty to alter and lower down the institution, in compliance with the taste and inclinations of mankind. If men cannot find it in their hearts to receive and comply with divine institutions as they come from God, we must not alter them and lower them down to their humours and inclinations. We may not warp off from divine institutions for the sake of making profelytes. It would, however, be a matter of just lamentation that children should be unbaptised, because their parents cannot find it in their hearts to make a complete dedication of themselves to God, and to bear a memorial of the dying love of the Redeemer; but it ought to be considered, that the cause of lamentation must arise from the unreasonable state of men's minds, and not from the unreasonableness and severity of such an institution, as makes such a complete dedication of themselves indispensably necessary to that seal of the covenant.

12thly. It has been urged, in favour of the practice of owning the covenant, that if none may be admitted to the ordinance of baptism, unless they attend upon the Lord's Supper, men will rush on, unprepared, to the table of the Lord.

REPLY. No plan can be answerable for the abuses it may suffer. If persons will rush on unprepared to the Lord's Supper, for the sake of having their children baptised, they must answer for their rashness. The same persons would covenant unworthily too, for the sake of the same privilege. If we would lower down the institution so that it could be liable to no abuse from the inconsiderateness or rashness of men, we must insist on no qualifications at all. If men are so eager to obtain baptism, as is supposed in what is now urged, they will covenant in an unworthy manner to obtain it. If men will make such an idol of baptism as to rush "upon the thick bosses" of the buckler of the Most High to obtain it, they must answer it to him. If we would effectually remove all danger arising from the rashness and inconsiderateness of men, we must dispense with all terms and qualifications; we must not even retain the practice of owning the covenant. So that what is now urged is nothing in favour of owning the covenant, and cannot be viewed as any objection to its exclusion.

13thly. In support of the practice under consideration, it has been further said; That people ought to be encouraged in every religious motion. If they cannot now bind themselves to do every thing, yet let them proceed as far as they can. This will encourage them to proceed further; whereas, if they may not proceed as far as their present light and inclination will admit, they will be discouraged from doing any thing.

REPLY. It is readily admitted, that every reasonable measure ought to be taken, to encourage men to do their duty? but nothing ought to be done, which indicates that they are something which they are not.

Baptism is designed as a public mark that men are christians or disciples. It was not designed to indicate that they are partly such—that they have taken some steps towards it, by doing some of the things which are required to be done by christians. Were there any instituted way to signify, how far persons have proceeded, who have not become christians altogether, in practice, such a sign might, with propriety, be used; but there is the greatest impropriety, in using a mark or sign, which indicates, that the persons on whom it is set, have become christians in full, when, in fact, they have only advanced some steps towards it. Therein the inconsistency of the practice under consideration appears; for in the administration of baptism; according to it, a public mark is set, of persons becoming christians, when in reality they have only taken some steps towards it. Now, although it be true, that religious motions are to be properly encouraged; yet it is perfectly unreasonable, that we should set the mark of their having become christians in full, when in fact, according to what is supposed in what is now urged, they have only set out to do something, but not all that which is required of christians. This would be imposing on the christian world, for the sake of encouraging individuals, to make further progress towards being real christians. Baptism was not designed as an encouragement to men to become christians, but as a positive mark that they are already such. So that no argument for the practice can be derived from what is now urged,—there is no reason for the practice in that view of it; but the highest impropriety, as the design of baptism is to signify, that persons are already christians, not that they have made some motions and taken some steps towards it.

Besides, granting christian privileges before men get to be really christians does not tend in the least, to encourage them to strive for further attainments; but the reverse. If persons are admitted to christian privileges short of their being fully christians, they have nothing further, of that nature to induce them to make further advances. If the privileges and immunities of a civil community were restricted to such as are, in all respects, loyal, there would be the strongest inducements to loyalty, in the view of all such as were desirous of sharing in those honors and privileges; but if, on the contrary, those who are loyal in some respects only, may share in them, as well as those who keep all the laws of the community, what inducements to loyalty, are there remaining, which arise from a desire of sharing in those privileges?

It must be thus, in the case under consideration. If christian privileges may be administered to such only as become christians in full, there is, every inducement to become such; but if such privileges may be conferred on such, as are only supposed to have taken some steps towards it, what inducement is left to such persons, to make further progress, arising from a desire of enjoying christian privileges? They have already attained them.

Further acquirements are not necessary in this view of it—They have nothing further to expect—They can obtain all such privileges with their present acquirements.

It is certain, therefore, that the practice of owning the covenant is not necessary, as an inducement to those persons to make further progress in religion, who cannot bind themselves to an attendance on all christian duties. It is so far from having a tendency to it, as that it has a most natural tendency to induce them to rest easy with present acquirements; for if they are sufficient to entitle to christian privileges, the inducement to strive for something further is removed. But if, on the contrary, christian privileges are restricted to those, who shall attend to all the commands of Christ, all the original motives, to induce persons to make proficiency in religious acquirements, do remain in full force.

There must, certainly, be the highest impropriety, in fixing the mark of christians in full on such, as are only christians in part; i. e. to such as only see their way clear to attend to some part of their duty. As has already been observed, if there were any instituted mark, which was designed to signify, how many steps a person had taken towards being a christian in full, there might be a propriety in making use of it, when persons had begun and taken some steps towards being such; but inasmuch as baptism is designed to signify, that persons are already christians, so there is a manifest impropriety in administering it to persons, who have only set out and taken some steps, short of the whole, towards it.

On the whole, I think it as evident as a truth can well be, that there is no propriety in the practice, when the nature of it is considered: and it is equally evident, that it is not necessary as an inducement to persons to make further progress in religious acquirements: but on the contrary, that it has a direct tendency to induce them to rest easy with present attainments; because, on that plan, they can have all the privileges they desire or ask for, with the progress and attainments they have already made. So that what is now urged affords not the least argument for the practice; it is rather a weighty reason for its abolition.

I have now taken notice of every thing that I can recollect to have heard offered in favor of the practice of owning the covenant; I would now desire you to take what has been said into serious consideration, and to judge upon it with impartiality. "Search the scriptures" to see if things be not really so; and remember that you are accountable for your faith as well as your practice. I shall now proceed as was proposed,

II. To exhibit a number of things to view, which show the unscriptural nature of the practice of owning the covenant; and why it ought to be abolished.

I would ask your serious attention to what will now be offered, and hope you will exercise all that impartiality which becomes accountable creatures, when attending to matters that are intimately connected with the welfare of Christ's kingdom in the world.

In replying to the various things which have been urged in favor of the practice, I have had occasion to touch on the principal things, which I have in my mind against it; so that much less enlargement will now be made, on many things that will be suggested, than would otherwise have been necessary. And it is hoped, that what has been said will be carefully remembered. I now proceed to say,

1st. That one reason which has great weight in my mind, for the abolition of the practice of administering baptism to the seed of such parents, who professedly and practically withhold their attendance upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is this, it does not appear that the apostles were in it.

It does not appear from any thing the apostles said or did that they were acquainted with such a practice. I am sensible, that in some instances, it is not said that those who were baptised, such as the Eunuch, Cornelius and others, were holden to an attendance upon the institution of the Lord's Supper ; yet there is as much said respecting that institution as any other christian duty ; and we have as much reason to believe, that the apostles considered them as holden to attend upon the institution of the Lord's Supper, as often as they should have opportunity, as upon any one christian duty. We may as well suppose, that some whom the apostles admitted to the ordinance of baptism were to attend on no one christian duty, as that they were not to attend on the institution of the Lord's Supper ; for, in the cases just mentioned, there is as much mention made of the Lord's Supper as any other duty.—It is nowhere said, that they did tolerate adults in an omission of the Lord's Supper.—What reason, therefore, have we to conclude they did practise such a toleration ? Such a conclusion must be altogether arbitrary. Some who have been professed advocates for the practice of owning the covenant, have acknowledged it as an undoubted fact, that all the disciples (in the apostles days) did attend upon the memorial of Christ's death. One, in particular, when speaking of the Lord's Supper, says, “ This was an ordinance appointed for the whole body of Christ's visible church to attend upon, who professed the christian faith. And accordingly they thus practised in the apostles' days, as all their disciples attended upon this memorial †.” Others have looked upon it very doubtful, whether the practice of owning the covenant be agreeable to the practice of the apostles ; or within the limits of divine institution ; for, it cannot otherwise be accounted for, that some should say, they are not for the practice whilst they are in it ; and another, that scarcely one minister in the nation is pleased with it.

Now, unless there be sufficient evidence, that the practice of admitting persons to the privilege of baptism, who professedly and practically withhold their attendance upon the institution of the Lord's Supper; was known to the apostles, what reason can be offered for the practice now? Were not the apostles sufficiently condescending? Or, is it more necessary now than in the apostles days? That cannot be pretended; for if it were ever necessary, it was then, when the disciples they made emerged out of a state of heathenism, and had not the advantages of a religious education from the earliest days of childhood. If the apostles were in the practice of owning the covenant, as now under consideration, it would have appeared from some thing they said or did: but it is no more evident that they tolerated their disciples in an omission of the Lord's Supper than any other duty. And it is certain, if the apostles were not in that practice, we have no kind of warrant for it; for they were certainly as well acquainted with the will of Christ as we can pretend to be. And among all the instances of their condescension, it does not appear, that they ever made any law or institution of Christ's kingdom give way to the weakness, scruples or prejudices of mankind.

2dly. Another reason for the abolition of the practice of owning the covenant, or administering baptism to such adults as withhold their attendance upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is this, it is in a degree a perversion of the end and design of baptism.

If we are to form our notions concerning the end and design of baptism, from the use and design of circumcision, we must view it as a mark and token of the covenant.* It is not a token of a partial covenant; but that a person is full in the covenant, or under engagements to do all covenant duties. Now, baptism, when administered to such, who do not mean to engage to attend upon all the duties of the covenant, and are not understood as engaging this, cannot with any propriety be used as a seal or token of the whole covenant; for the person is not full in the covenant; or which is the same thing, he is not under engagements to do or attend upon all the duties of the covenant.—The Lord's Supper is a covenant duty; but such as own the covenant, as now under consideration, do not mean to engage to do this, or to live in the observation of that institution: Their covenant is therefore partial; it does not extend to all the duties of the covenant.—There is therefore this inconsistency in administering baptism to such as only make such a covenant, it fixes that which was designed and intended as a mark of the whole covenant, to a covenant which is short of the whole; that is, to a covenant which does not include complete subjection.† It may be said, that the person who enters into covenant, may suppose that he engages every thing that is required of him; yet, inasmuch as he really does not, we ought rather to set him right, than to misuse the seal, or in any measure pervert the end and design of baptism. Again, 3dly. If we may infer any thing, concerning the practice now under consideration, from the laws and rules which God gave his church, under the Jewish dispensation, it must be this, that it ought to be abolished.

The rules and laws which God gave his church, under the former dispensation, did not admit of a practice of that nature; for it was expressly ordered, that he who kept not the passover, should be cut off from his people. There was no toleration of such a neglect or omission. It is true, if a Jew should hap-

† Some seem to insist upon it, that the covenant such make who own the covenant, as 'tis called, is full and complete; but it is certain they do not engage to attend upon all christian duties; their covenant does not extend to all covenant duties; or so far as the covenant of other professors. It may be granted, it is not, strictly speaking, a half-way covenant; but it can't be pretended that it is full and complete, for if omitting one covenant duty does not render a covenant incomplete, omitting two does not; and if omitting two does not, then omitting all covenant duties would not. I am unable to conceive what we are to understand by a complete covenant, unless it be an engagement to do all the duties of the covenant: And if this be what we are to understand by it, then such as do not engage to do all the duties of the covenant, are not in a complete covenant standing.

pen to be unclean or on a distant journey at the time the passover was to be kept, he was tolerated in an omission of it until the next month; but not till the next annual return of the passover, on any pretence whatever. That constitution did not admit one to a standing in the church, or among God's people, who lived in a neglect of one public institution.† Some will say, perhaps, that when it is said that he that "forbeareth to keep the passover" shall be cut off from his people, it is meant one, who shall neglect to keep it out of slight and contempt; but with much greater reason it may be said, that it meant every person, who for any reason whatever should live in an habitual omission of that institution; for there is no distinction made: and the whole account teaches us, that no excuse or apology could be offered, excepting defilement or being on a distant journey, and that was considered as a sufficient excuse, only for an occasional omission; or delaying to keep it for one month. There is something very striking and significant, in God's making such special provision for such as could not keep the passover on the fourteenth day of the first month: God's making it necessary to keep it by themselves, on the fourteenth day of the next month, evidently teaches us, that God did insist upon it that such as had a standing in his church, or among his covenant people, should by no means live in a neglect or omission of one capital institution: So that if we may collect any thing from the constitution of the Jewish church, respecting the practice of owning the covenant, it is this: that it ought never to have been introduced; and so ought now to be abolished.

4thly. Another reason for the abolition of the practice of owning the covenant is, its contrariety to the plain sense and meaning of the commission which Christ gave his apostles, when he sent them forth to baptise.

The commission which Christ gave his apostles was expressed in these words : “ Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost ;—teaching them to observe ALL things whatsoever I have commanded you.” † Now the most plain and obvious meaning of this commission is this :—“ Go ye and teach all nations,” that is Jews and Gentiles ;—teach them the nature and duties of the Christian religion :—And having led them to an understanding of them things, if any should be so far convinced of their reality, importance and excellency as to be desirous of embracing and engaging in my cause and service, do you baptise them, or set upon them the mark of my followers and subjects : But, in the mean time, do you insist upon it, that they “ observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you ;”—that they live in the practice of all the duties of the christian religion ; for, I would not have you set the mark belonging to my subjects, upon such as live in the neglect of the things which I have commanded and enjoined ; or upon such as are not really subject to my will, as signified in my commands and institutions.—This is the most plain and natural import of the commission. And, without any further comment upon it, it must appear to be directly opposed to the practice of owning the covenant, which admits those to baptism, who do not mean to be understood to engage an attendance upon a plain commanded duty, and are not considered by others as censurable for a neglect.

5thly. Another reason for the exclusion of the practice of owning the covenant is this : It stands opposed to the will of Christ, as signified in the institution of the Lord’s Supper.

The ordinance of the Lord’s Supper is not to be viewed, merely as a privilege which men may enjoy, but it ought to be considered as a duty which is incumbent on disciples, as such. The direction, “ Do ye this in remembrance of me," was designed for some body :—And to whom did our Saviour direct himself, excepting his disciples ?—And, are not adults, who enjoy the seal of the covenant, disciples? Don't the church consider them as such, when they grant them the seal of baptism? They most certainly do. They are, therefore, the very persons to whom our Saviour directs himself, when he says, "Do ye this in remembrance of me." This shows that the will of Christ, as signified and expressed in the institution of the Lord's Supper, is of a very different import from that practice, which dispenses with their attendance upon it; and that such a practice stands directly opposed to Christ's will as signified in that institution; for therein Christ says, do ye this, &c. but this practice essentially consists in dispensing with an attendance upon it. Again, 6thly. The practice of owning the covenant is unjustifiable, as it builds up one ordinance at the expence of another.

The practice of owning the covenant, if it were made perfect, would strip the communion table of guests. The more it is practised, the smaller is the number of those who bear a memorial of Christ's love. The plain language of it is, it is better that the great Redeemer should be without a memorial, than that worms of the dust should be without the seal of the covenant! The practice essentially consists in dispensing with an attendance upon the instituted memorial of Christ's death, in order to persons enjoying the seal of the covenant, or the privilege of baptism. The Lord's Supper is subordinated to the ordinance of baptism by this practice. The memorial of Christ's death, is, as it were, set aside, that men may enjoy the seal of baptism. It is more than possible, that in process of time, this practice will strip the communion table of guests. It is a fact which cannot be disputed, that owning the covenant is a place in which men are exceedingly inclined to rest easy; and it is equally true, that the people in such places where the practice has obtained, and is not scrupled, run more and more into it. And, the practice of owning the covenant, on the whole, flourishes and thrives on the ruins of the other institution; the one is built up on the ruins of the other: And in this view of it, it is altogether unjustifiable; as we have no right or warrant to set the ordinances of Christ at variance with each other.

7thly. Another reason for the exclusion of the practice of owning the covenant is, it sets up an unwarrantable distinction among professed Christians.

The scriptures consider Christians as being of one denomination; not as Christians in part and Christians in full. They consider all professors, I mean adults, as having one faith, one Lord, one baptism, &c.* And the apostles always addressed them as being of one denomination. But the practice of owning the covenant makes different denominations of christians. Those who own the covenant do not mean to engage to do so much as other professed Christians do; they do not mean to engage an attendance upon one plain and important institution; neither do such as admit them understand them as engaging to do it, or disciplinable if they neglect it. So that there is really a difference made by that practice among professors; and such a difference too, as is not warranted by any thing revealed in the scriptures: And, for this reason, it is a practice that ought to be abolished.

8thly. The practice of owning the covenant is absolutely unnecessary upon the principles of the gospel.

The qualifications for baptism and the Lords Supper are really one and the same. Persons must be in covenant in order to baptism: And being in the covenant certainly qualifies for all covenant duties and privileges. And there can be no greater or more solemn transaction, than for creatures to covenant with their great Creator. It is true, indeed, if persons mean no more by covenanting than to appear well, externally, there is no great solemnity in it; but if they mean to give up themselves to God to be his, and to receive him as their God, and consider covenanting as implying a heart corresponding with the words of the covenant, it is not only solemn, but it implies every thing requisite to an acceptable discharge of all Christian duties.

Besides, covenanting, in its nature, implies in it an engagement to do all covenant duties; for what do we mean by covenanting, except it be engaging to do the duties of the covenant? And the Lord's Supper is one plain duty of the covenant.—The qualifications for baptism and the Lord's Supper, therefore, being one and the same, as they are both covenant duties, there can be, on the principles of the gospel, no necessity for the practice of owning the covenant; and as it is unnecessary on gospel principles, it ought to be viewed so on every principle, and so to be abolished.

Again,

9thly. Another reason which I would offer for the abolition of the practice of owning the covenant is this: It is built upon a principle which cannot, consistently, stop short of dispensing with all christian duties.

I am unable to see what right or warrant a church has to tolerate a person in the neglect of the Lord's Supper, rather than in a neglect of any other duty. The principle upon which the practice is founded is this: That scrupulous consciences must be indulged; but if they must be indulged so far as to dispense with divine institutions for their sake, where will the principle end? If one scruple must be so far indulged, why not another? If a person may be viewed and treated as in good standing in the neglect of the Lord's Supper, why not for the same reason in the neglect of any other duty? Here is one has doubts and scruples respecting the doctrine of original sin;—another has doubts respecting the divinity of Christ;—a third has scruples about the Christian Sabbath;—a fourth person doubts whether there be any Sabbath at all: Now,

Why may we not tolerate all these doubts, and a thousand more, so far as to give up the necessity of a belief of those doctrines; and the practice of those duties, as well as the scruple respecting the Lord's Supper? Why may not a church tolerate one neglect in one person, another neglect in another person, and so on till they tolerate, among them all, a neglect of every duty of the Christian religion, as well as a neglect of the Lord's Supper? If we once begin to dispense with an attendance upon divine institutions, on account of erroneous scruples, I know not where we can fix those nice bounds which may not be superceded. I am unable to see, why other ordinances must not give way to scruples, as well as the Lord's Supper. Is the Lord's Supper so unimportant an institution, as that men may be good christians in the neglect of it, and not in the neglect of other duties? Why should this be almost the only neglect which can be tolerated?—The principle on which the practice of owning the covenant is built, if pursued, must make thorough work with christian duties. If we once begin to dispense with christian duties, or an attendance upon them, on account of erroneous scruples, I cannot see where we may consistently stop.

Furthermore,

10thly. The consequences of which the practice of owning the covenant is productive, show the importance of its being abolished.

Could we not see very bad consequences flowing from it, yet, inasmuch as there appears no room in the institution for it,—as it is not supported by the practice of the apostles, and the principle on which it is built is subversive of all christian duties, it ought to be excluded. But the practice is, most manifestly, productive of many bad consequences.

11thly. It naturally leads men to think, that in covenanting with God, there is very little solemnity.

This practice leads people to think, that it is a small matter to covenant;—that the obligations on such as only covenant are small, compared with the obligations which are upon those who are in full communion. It is granted that they are told otherwise; yet inasmuch as they are admitted out of indulgence to such an opinion, they will think so, and it is most manifest that a great part feel so.

2dly. Another evil attendant on the practice of owning the covenant, is, the unkind influence it has on the person who is admitted to privileges in that way.

It is done, I grant, out of real kindness to the scrupulous person; but it is not kind in its influence respecting him. It rather confirms his scruple; for the practice looks as if the church thought it a just one. To say the least, by indulging the scruple, the scrupulous are put to rest; and they commonly rest very easy without seeking any thing further. It is like sewing pillows under mens arm-holes; and it removes some special incentives, they would have otherwise had to be assiduous, in making their way clear to an attendance upon the other ordinance and institution.

3dly. The practice of owning the covenant has a bad influence, not only on the person who has privileges in that way, but on others.

It naturally leads others to think there is a real difference, in point of qualification, for the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper; or in other words, it has a natural tendency to train up others in just such a scruple as it was designed to indulge. When others see there is a real difference in practice, respecting the two ordinances, they will conclude that there is a difference as to the requisite qualifications for them; and thus the scruple grows up with them. The practice is the mother and the nurse of such scruples.—In this way it embarrasses the minds of the more serious, and frightens them away from Christ's table.—They think that covenanting with God is a most solemn transaction, and if partaking of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper be still more solemn, as this practice teaches, they will say as St. Paul did in another case, "Who is sufficient for these things?"—As the practice does naturally lead persons to think, that there is a real difference in point of qualification for the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper ; so they will either conclude, that it is a small matter to covenant with God ; or if they retain proper conceptions of covenanting, they will be frightned away from Christ's table, as too sacred for partially sanctified creatures to approach. It almost necessarily leads to one or the other of these extremes. Again,

The practice of owning the covenant, naturally leads people to make an idol of baptism ; and to consider the ordinance of the Lord's Supper as of small consequence ; for as mankind in that practice are exhibiting a great zeal for baptism, and show but little or no inclination to enjoy the ordinance of the Lord's Supper ; so it is natural for young people, who are trained up under it, to conclude, that it must be because baptism is of so much greater importance than the other ordinances. Hence it is, that so many feel very uneasy till their children are baptised, and so easy in neglecting, all their days, the memorial of Christ's death.

These and a variety of other evil consequences which might be mentioned, of which the practice of owning the covenant is productive, show the importance of its being abolished. I will only add, 11thly. That the good consequences attending a contrary practice, show the importance of abolishing the practice of owning the covenant.

I am very sensible, that many disagreeable consequences may follow an attempt to abolish the practice of owning the covenant, through an unjust attachment to it, and the unreasonable prejudice of men in its favor. I am also, sensible, that it has been said, that if none may be admitted to the privilege of baptism, excepting such as engage an attendance upon all instituted duties, without excepting an attendance upon the Lord's Supper, several bad consequences will ensue ; such as many children going unbaptised ; rushing on unprepared to the communion table, &c. But these have been already shown to be unnatural consequences, if they should take place. As they have already been considered, I shall refer you to what hath been said respecting them; and proceed to point out several very important things which would attend a practice that admits no adults to the privilege of baptism, who do not engage an attendance upon all institutions. And,

1st. Such a practice would make a union and oneness among professed Christians.

They would then have one faith; one Lord; and one baptism: They would in all respects be one, as to visible Christianity; which would make a church appear like the church in the apostles days, as they would then continue stedfastly in the apostles doctrines, and in breaking of bread and in prayers.

2dly. If none were admitted to baptism excepting such as engage to attend upon all ordinances, the honor of all ordinances would be equally maintained.

While the ordinance of the Lord's Supper is made to give way to the ordinance of baptism, the former will be considered as of but little importance when compared with the latter: but if none were admitted to baptism, excepting such as attend upon all ordinances, the importance of all would be vindicated and maintained; the rights of the Lord's table and Christ's authority in all his institutions would be supported. A church would then speak the same language with Christ in his ordinances, both in word and practice.

3dly. If none should be admitted to baptism, I mean adults, excepting such as engage to attend upon all ordinances, good purposes would be answered, respecting such as may be under scruples.

It would make them painful in their endeavors to remove their scruples. If we should labor to remove, instead of indulging scruples, we should stand a good chance to obliterate them, and so to help on the scrupulous person to attend, with comfort and satisfaction, upon his whole duty : But if we should once indulge it, his scruple, if any thing, would be more confirmed ; at least, it would not be removed, and the best opportunity for removing it would be over and past.

Once more,

4thly. If none were admitted to baptism, excepting such as attend upon all ordinances, it would answer kind purposes to mankind in general.

It would lead all to see the importance of all ordinances : It would guard them against unjust scruples ; for if they should see no distinction among ordinances in practice, they would not suspect any difference, in point of qualification, for special ordinances. It would also lead people to see the importance of being prepared and qualified for an early attendance upon the Lord's Supper, as well as baptism.

Thus the tendency of a practice which admits none to baptism, excepting such as attend upon all ordinances and live in the practice of all Christian duties, is such, as I apprehend would sufficiently justify the abolition of the practice of owning the covenant.

We have now taken a particular view of the nature and tendency of the practice of owning the covenant. We have considered the foundation on which it rests, and the reasons for its exclusion. It has, I apprehend, been shown, that it was not in being in the apostles days : That it is contrary to the express will of God, as manifested to his church under the former dispensation : That it is contrary to the spirit and plain import of the commission which Christ gave his apostles, when he sent them forth to baptise : That it is opposed to the will of Christ, as expressed in the institution of the Lord's Supper : That it sets up an unwarrantable distinction between the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper : That it is utterly unnecessary upon gospel principles : That it makes an unwarrantable distinction among professed Christians : That the principle on which it is built and grounded, is such, as that there can, consistently, be no stop short of an indulgence of all scruples, and an exemption from the practice of all Christian duties, so far as any scruples may happen to arise about them: That it is of a bad and pernicious tendency, both respecting such as are indulged and others. Finally, it has been observed, that the tendency of a contrary practice is such, as fully justifies and warrants the abolition and exclusion of the practice of owning the covenant. The matter, my hearers, is now submitted to your impartial consideration; and I hope you will not fail to search the scriptures diligently, to see if things are so; and may the FATHER of LIGHTS direct you into a right understanding of them.

I M P R O V E M E N T.

All that will be offered, by way of improvement, will be in two particulars. And,

First, What has been said leads us to see the unreasonable nature of many things, that have been said against that practice which admits none to the ordinance of baptism, who live in an habitual neglect of any public ordinance and institution.

Many things have been said, which are highly calculated to raise popular clamor and uneasiness. It has been said, that such a practice, debars persons of baptism, casts them out of covenant, is hard, cruel, &c. But what has been said, leads such to see that persons cast themselves out of covenant, by not keeping covenant with God, or not living in the practice of covenant duties. If there be any fault, it is in themselves. If there be any cruelty and severity in the case, it is in the institution, and not in those who practice according to it. The charge therefore terminates against God; for it has been shown, that his institution admits none to baptism, excepting such who are in covenant with him; or do engage to live in the practice of covenant duties; if, therefore, there be any cruelty or severity in not admitting such to the ordinance of baptism, who withhold their attendance on covenant duties, it is owing to the institution. But how unjust and unreasonable is the out-cry, that it is cruel and severe to withhold baptism from such who withhold their attendance upon the ordinance of the Lord's Supper? What has been said leads us to see that it is an act of real kindness to them and to all around. Indulgence may be sweet to persons, but it is no act of kindness to confirm their scruples and to sew pillows under their arm holes that they may feel easy in a neglect of plain gospel institutions: No, it is the worst thing that can be done for them, and its evil influence extends to multitudes around them.

And what has been said leads us to see, that if any should suffer their children to go unbaptised, because they cannot obtain baptism, unless they attend upon the memorial of Christ's death, they would act a perfectly unreasonable part; for the Lord's Supper is a reasonable institution, and it is a duty of the covenant. The apostles admitted persons to baptism on no other terms. It becomes men to be very cautious how they raise a clamour against such a practice, by calling it hard and cruel, since it terminates against the constitution of heaven, and is of equal force against the practice of the apostles.

Secondly. What has been said will be further improved, in some particular addresses.

1st. To the church in general.

My Brethren, you have now had the practice of owning the covenant laid open to you, both as to the nature of it and its consequences: And using that impartiality which it becomes you to exercise, must you not determine, that its consequences are bad—that it stands opposed to the will of Christ and the rights of his table—that it is entirely unnecessary upon the principles of the gospel? Are not the qualifications for baptism and the Lord's Supper one and the same? If there be a scruple in the mind of any one, is there precept or example in the Bible for dispensing with an attendance on plain gospel institutions in a way of condescension to it? Moreover, is not the practice of owning the covenant opposed to the practice of the apostles, whose disciples continued, stedfastly, in breaking of bread, as well as in the apostles doctrines and in prayers? And, is it not opposed to the commission which Christ gave to the apostles? If these things do appear to you, does not the honor of Christ and the welfare of Zion demand, that a period be put to the practice? As you are professed friends of Christ and his cause, you are bound to think on these things, and to act as Christ and the welfare of his church demand.

2dly. I would particularly address such as are in a covenant standing, and yet withhold their attendance on the memorial of Christ's death.

I have now considered the standing you are in, with freedom and impartiality; and have shown, I trust, that it is wholly unscriptural; yet I do not consider you as in it with a view of its unscriptural nature, or pernicious consequences: I consider you as having acted honestly, yet erroneously. You will not think that I am your enemy, because I have told you the truth. I can truly say concerning you, as St. Paul said concerning his brethren, the Jews, "My heart's desire and prayer to God for you is, that ye may be saved." You will suffer me further, with all the earnestness and importunity which becometh one who hath the welfare of your souls in charge, to urge you to consider, whether the standing you are in be not unscriptural—whether it does not become the professed disciples of Jesus Christ to keep all his commandments? "If ye love me, keep my commandments," says Christ. You profess to call Christ your Lord and Master: But says Christ, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" This demand of our Saviour's is directly to your case; and I entreat you to consider, whether you can ever answer for your neglect to Christ—whether you are not called upon to quit your present standing; and as you profess to call Christ, LORD, whether you are not bound to do as he hath commanded you?

Let what has been said be impartially considered by you, and then ask your own consciences, whether you ought to persist any longer in a practice, so evidently contrary to the practice of the apostles?

3dly. I will offer a few words in an address to such as have not, as yet, dedicated their children to God in baptism.

The obligations upon you to dedicate your children to God in baptism, are great and indispensable: But then it is your duty to dedicate them in the manner that God has directed you. Why do you delay and neglect in so important a duty? Is it because you may not proceed in it unless you attend upon all the duties of the covenant without excepting the institution of the Lord's Supper? What right have you to that seal of the covenant, short of your engaging to do covenant duties? A Jew might not be acknowledged as having a standing in the covenant, who would live in an habitual neglect of a plain covenant duty. There is no evidence that the apostles baptised on any other terms; Why then should you desire it? You will say that you scruple your qualifications for an attendance upon the ordinance of the Lord's Supper; but why more than your qualifications for covenanting? Is a person qualified to engage to do the duties of the covenant, and yet not qualified actually to do them?—You cannot take upon you the whole covenant, unless you engage to attend upon the memorial of Christ's death: for that is a covenant duty. Besides, would you have plain gospel institutions set aside in condescension to your scruples? Where is the precept; where is the example for such condescension? It is not to be found in your Bibles. Moreover, can you answer your neglect to Christ?—Will it do (when he comes to enquire of you the occasion of your neglect) for you to say, we might not receive the ordinance unless we had engaged an attendance upon the instituted memorial of thy death! Will you have a face to urge that, as an unreasonable term! Howsoever you may now view the matter, you can never find an excuse which will justify your neglect from that quarter. I am far from desiring to abridge you of one privilege: My duty and interest both invite me to do every thing for you, which is consistent with that respect I always ought to have for divine institutions. I urge it upon you, to consider, what hath been said with impartiality, and compare it with the word of God; and then ask your own consciences, whether there is not the greatest probability, if not full evidence, that the practice of owning the covenant is not of divine original.

C O N C L U S I O N.

LET one and all be disposed to receive and embrace the light, which divine revelation sets before you. There is a day of solemn account approaching, wherein every one will be judged according to the gospel. If, therefore, what hath been said be agreeable to the scriptures (which appears to me, after the most painful examination, to be really the case) no prejudices ought to reject it. And, I cannot but think, that what hath been said, must recommend itself to every man's conscience, as inculcating a plan agreeable to what the church was used to of old;—a plan, agreeable to what the church was used to in the apostles days?—and a plan calculated to maintain the honor and authority of Christ,—to excite and quicken to all duty, and to build up the church of Christ in the world in unity.

May the FATHER of LIGHTS accompany divine truth with his blessing, and grant that we may build upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone: And in HIM may the whole building, being fitly framed together, grow up into an holy Temple in the Lord.—AMEN.
